FAMILY – PART 1

According to Wikipedia, the word “shalom” means many things. On its surface, it simply means “peace,” and can be used to mean “hello” and “goodbye.” It can also be used to mean “peace,” either between two people or two countries.

Keep in mind that the concept of peace can suggest far more than the absence of violence. A precarious ceasefire with tensions on the verge of erupting might look like momentary peace, but doesn’t reach the fullness of shalom. Shalom has connotations of well-being, of wholeness, of everything being in the right place. It can suggest the idea that all humans and all of creation are living in justice and alignment with God. It can suggest universal flourishing, where every need is met and every gift is utilized, where everything is the way it ought to be. Shalom can be the quiet of a still, calm morning and it can be the action of creating wholeness or justice.

What does shalom feel like, for you?

Where do you see shalom in your life, right now?

Where is shalom desperately needed, and how can you create it?

Today’s text describes a physical body with many parts. Some parts might seem more important or necessary than others, but all of our parts were designed to work together. The same is true for a family, or a church congregation – the body of Christ.

Do you think we’re all necessary in the body of Christ? How does every person showing up as their best self help move us forward? Why does that matter?

How does this concept of being one body intersect with the concept of shalom?

How can we practice being part of this family, and creating shalom / wholeness / flourishing / peace?
How is every member of this family responsible for the shalom we all share?
